LOCALISED FATTY DEPOSITS: WHITE AND BROWN FAT

Sedentary lifestyles, irregular and unbalanced meals and lack of physical activity are all causes that, together with physiological slower metabolism, cause an increase in weight or localised fatty deposits.

There are two types of fat in our body: white fat and brown fat, both with different features and functions.

White fat consists of very large cells (white adipocytes) that accumulate fatty acids and store them. On the other hand, brown fat consists of cells that store fat in small particles that are used, thanks to thermogenesis, as a source of energy.

The areas where fat is stored are affected by sex: in men, fatty deposits are more frequent around the waist, while in women on thighs, buttocks and breasts. With age, and the consequent hormonal variations, fatty deposits concentrate around the waist in women too, so that women lose the characteristic female shape.
